ISN'T ARBITRATION BETTER THAN A NATION-WIDE RAIL STRIKE?

When two people find it impossible to agree, they frequently leave the decision up to a third party. This is arbitration.

Arbitration, we believe, is the only way left to head off a crippling nation-wide rail strike. The railroads have repeatedly said they are willing to leave the decision in the work rules dispute to an impartial third party. The rail unions have consistently refused to trust their case to such impartial analysis and decision.

The only remaining solution appears to be action by Congress requiring both parties to submit to arbitration.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THIS?
WHAT COULD BE FAIRER?

The public overwhelmingly favors arbitration over a rail strike. A recent nation-wide survey by one of America's oldest and most respected opinion research organizations showed a three to one vote among the general public for arbitration in the transportation industry (60% for, 20% against, 20% no opinion).

Do union members share their leaders' opposition to arbitration?

THEY DO NOT!

The same survey showed 54% of union members in favor of arbitration over a strike, 30% in opposition, and 16% no opinion.

How do union families who stand the brunt of a work stoppage feel about arbitration? By a greater majority than the general public, they favor arbitration over a strike. Sixty-six per cent of the union families support arbitration, while only 19% oppose, and 15% express no opinion.

In view of the basic fairness of an impartial third party decision when two sides fail to agree; in view of the overwhelming public support for the principle of arbitration in transportation; and in view of the disastrous consequences of a nation-wide rail strike, Congress can serve the public interest best by promptly enacting legislation requiring a settlement of the issues in this dispute.
